

Get involved

Connecticut is Building a Presence for Science

Become a Local Point of Contact

Points of Contact are classroom teachers or other educators who volunteer to be their school's or organization's advocate for science. They participate in an online, statewide network and share information with their colleagues.

The Connecticut Academy for Education, Science Supervisors Association, Science Teachers Association, and State Department of Education are working together to help Points of Contact:

- Share ideas and network with science-teaching colleagues,
- Receive up-to-date news and resources directly from the State Department of Education and other partners,
- Learn more about standards-based science teaching and learning for all students, and
- Gain access to instructional and professional development materials available online.

Or a Regional Key Leader

In addition to the above, Key Leaders help recruit and network with Points of Contact. They become familiar with science standards and help promote standards-based instruction and professional development. Some also provide training in the use of the Eisenhower National Clearinghouse (ENC).

- Sign me up! I would like to volunteer to be a Point of Contact at my school.
- Please contact me! I am interested in becoming a Key Leader for my region.
